The many ruffled skirts of the second empire period seem to be gaining more favor daily. They are, of course, modified types of the period named, but suggest even greater volumnity as the season advances. This little frock of white voile has three circular flounces building the skirt, each one edged with white moire silk and having embroideries of pale yellow outlining the cut design of the silk. A charming vest effect is noted, with the gold buttons grouped upon the crossed fronts, a prominent feature. Old blue velvet ribbon is used for the girdle and for the collar motifs.
